

WHY TAKE A MOCK EXAM?

You've seen the practice problems and completed the study guides. You've memorized formulas and answered so many trig questions you feel like your brain might shut down at any moment. You've practiced and practiced, and you know the material. You've even made flash cards. You've done everything you would normally do to study for an exam. By this point in your academic career, you're a test-taking expert: you've taken literally hundreds of exams since your days as a toddling kindergartener. So why take mock exams?

Because standardized tests are a special kind of monster.

Most noticeably, they are unique because of the weight they hold in our country's education system: if you allow them to, these exams have the potential to determine the direction your life will take after high school. Talk about anxiety. And the stress of adding a new environment into the equation only compounds the problem. So why not practice applying your knowledge in a new atmosphere?

Standardized exams are also long. Really long. Imagine walking into first period, sitting down, and realizing you're glued to your chair and stuck in absolute silence with no hope of escaping for at least the next four hours while your brain is pushed to its limit answering questions about triangles, prepositions, and author's purpose. That's the SAT, and it takes some endurance. So build your exam endurance with Cram Crew!

If you're new to the test preparation game, mock exams can give you a great place to start: they'll show you exactly where you're comfortable and where you need more practice while also giving you a concrete starting point from which to track your growth. That's pretty exciting stuff.

No matter what your experience is with taking exams, mock exams are an absolute must if you want to live up to your test-taking potential.

And to top it all off—they're free.
